Being chosen as an Inspirational Woman is a blessing, and I am truly grateful for this honour.

Forty years ago, I reached a moment when comfort and calling collided. I was working a stable government job, yet every day a quiet whisper told me, “You were made for more.” I longed to be present for my children and to live a life aligned with my values — God, family, and purpose. But I felt drained, unfulfilled, and aware that my gifts were being wasted. Despite fear, bills, and uncertainty, I eventually walked away from security and stepped into entrepreneurship.

That decision tested me in every way. As an introvert, speaking to groups terrified me, yet commitment taught me something powerful: entrepreneurship doesn’t create character — it reveals it. It reveals grit, resilience, courage, and the light we carry. As my business grew, I discovered my true purpose wasn’t just building a business — it was building people. Encouraging, empowering, and helping others believe in themselves became my mission.

Over the years, I’ve learned that every one of us carries a light capable of lifting others. When you give encouragement, kindness, and belief, it always returns in unexpected and meaningful ways. The more I poured into others, the more my own life expanded.

After forty years, I still love inspiring people, and I’m far from finished. Your calling lives outside your comfort zone. Step into courage. Shine your light boldly. Take the leap even when you’re afraid.

Be the light. Be the leap. Be unstoppable
